Officials records do not tell what other people in the country felt, and what lay behind their actions.

Q6.

The officials record of the British administration.

Q7.

According to James Mill, the evil practices that dominated to the Indian social life were religious intolerance, caste taboos and superstitious practices.

O8.

Official records do not always help us understand what other people in the country felt, and what lay behind their actions.

For that we have diaries of people, accounts of pilgrims and travelers, autobiographies of important personalities, and popular books, etc.

With the spread of printing press, newspapers came to be published and issued began to be debated in public. Leaders and reforms wrote to spread their ideas, poets and novelists wrote to express their feelings.

Q9. One important source is the official records of the British administration as they believed that the act of writing was important.

Every instruction, plan, policy decision, agreement, an investigation was clearly written up.

They produced an administrative culture of memos, notings, and reports.

The British felt that all important documents and letters needed to be carefully preserved. So they set-up record rooms attached to all administrative institutions.

The village tahsildar's office, the collectorate, the secretariats, the law-courts- all had their record rooms.

Specialised institutions like archives and museums were also established to preserve important.

Letters and memos that moved from one branch of the administration to another in the early years of the nineteenth century can still be read in the archives.
